ST. MICHAEL'S COLLEGE

*the university of st.
michael's college, a
federated college
of the university of toronto, presents
keystone.*

A keystone, suggesting both a sense of gothic and a sense of hegemony (as something on which associated things depend), seems to be a qualified and, even, an ironic representation of our university. For, whereas, St. Michael's College and the University of Toronto seem to be steeped in gothic and tradition, we observe, juxtaposed with the archway between Fisher and More, the new Student Centre; celebrated in lofty St. Basil's, new Masses attended by new Catholics who bear a strange resemblance to their predecessors in many ways; posited before Soldier's Tower and through the heavy wooden doors of Hart House, young adults with young minds confronting traditional ideas.

And, whereas, St. Michael's is able to assert a degree of influence, hegemony, over some students here others are quite intent on facing the university community and themselves with only token recognition given to this parochial community. St. Michael's is an amalgam of "gothic" and "youth", participant factions and quiet people. It is the interaction between these amorphous forces which takes place undramatically every day, that definitively suggests life here at St. Michael's College.

This publication is an observation, a retrospective glance at the year 1967-68 at St. Michael's College, and at the University of Toronto from the viewpoint of St. Michael's people. As such it is a kind of history, and in that role it portrays two aspects.

First, as an historical presentation, it features generalities. Page after page here is filled with pictures of organizations, of groups, of old and new buildings, or even of this year's graduates. All these are attempts to represent every "type" of student at this university, in order to give, in an historical, almost, sociological way, a character to the year 1967-1968. In any historical period, a characteristic is derived from observing the most obvious, dominant, participating elements of the society of that period.

But such a characteristic is only cursory.

The second aspect of a history enters here--it is impossible to actually regain or recreate a sense of the individual, the "person", or even the "happening" in a retrospective manner. The closest one can come is through myths. The individual, the "person", is hopefully (ideally) in a constant state of flux, of developing, and he is not contained by Kodak film. The moment, the "happening" passes, and what a way to spend this moment harking back on the last one.

The following is a myth. A representation. And one in need of a relative and subjective interpretation. We present it to you, a qualified representation like our keystone.
